Coffee Background

Sulawesi is one of the main islands in Indonesia, where the Dutch East Indies Trading Company introduced coffee in the 1700s. Back then, the island was known by its Dutch colonial name of Celebes, which is why coffee from Sulawesi is sometimes referred to as Celebes coffee.

The heart of Sulawesi coffee production is in the highlands of Tana Toraja, where mountain slopes reaching elevations of up to 2000 meters are home to predominantly smallholder farmers. The soil is mildly acidic, and temperatures fluctuate greatly between day and night, with a wet and humid microclimate.

Much of the coffee in Sulawesi is grown wildy, conveniently planted wherever trees can fit and is distinguished by its full-bodied richness and earthiness. This Sulawesi green coffee features flavorful notes of pipe tobacco and plum, coupled with savory characteristics and a medium acidity for a deeply satisfying cup profile.

The wet-hulled coffee process, locally known as Giling Basah, is the method of choice in Indonesia due to the humid climate. The wet-hulled process has become synonymous with Indonesian coffees and contributes to its unique cup profile.
