Coffee Background

Finca El Diviso, led by Nestor Lasso, is a multi-generational, family-owned farm that has evolved into a hub of innovation in Colombian specialty coffee. Eight years ago, Nestor began experimenting with high-end varieties like Geisha and Pink Bourbon, inspired by competition-winning producers who were pushing boundaries with unique genetics such as Java. This led to a disciplined approach to farm management, tailored to each varietal's needs.

While the Java variety is named for the Indonesian island of Java, genetic studies have identified it as an Ethiopian landrace known as Abyssinia. Java gained attention for its coffee berry disease resistance and its suitability for low-input farming.

In the washed anaerobic process perfectly ripe cherries with the highest sugar content are selected. After floating to remove defects, the cherries undergo a thermic shock to intensify sugar concentration. They're then sealed in plastic bags for anaerobic fermentation.

What began as a challenge has become a trend, requiring precision to preserve the Java variety's distinct characteristics. Slow drying with air-recycling dryers ensures consistency and flavor integrity. Every step must be executed flawlessly to avoid losing the varietal's unique profile.
